

THIS WEEK IN JEWISH HISTORY

By: Avi Hirsch

In the early 1930s, the Pacific Ocean was an insurmountable barrier that swallowed ships and time alike. To send a letter from California to the Philippines meant entrusting it to a steamship for a slow, three-week crawl across the waves.

By the end of November 1935, that barrier had been shattered forever.

It was November 22, 1935, in Alameda, California. The Great Depression was still weighing heavily on the nation, yet the spirit of American innovation refused to be grounded. A massive crowd of over 125,000 people gathered along the waterfront, eyes fixed on the San Francisco Bay.

They were there to witness the departure of the China Clipper, a glorious Martin M-130 flying boat operated by Pan American Airways. The status quo said that transoceanic flight was too dangerous, too heavy, and too far for a commercial payload.

But American ambition has never cared much for the word "impossible."

Leading the crew was the legendary Captain Edwin C. Musick. He sat at the controls of the massive silver bird, which was weighed down with nearly two tons of mail—over 110,000 letters destined for the other side of the world. The engines roared to life, churning the water into a frenzy.

With a deafening thunder that shook the chests of the onlookers, the 26-ton aircraft throttled forward. It fought the drag of the water, picking up speed until, with a final spray of seafoam, it broke free from the surface and climbed into the sky.

This wasn't just a flight; it was a calculated conquest of distance. The route required a daring island-hopping strategy to refuel and rest: Honolulu, Midway Island, Wake Island, Guam, and finally, Manila.

She carried the mail. She carried the flag. She carried the future.

The flight covered 8,000 miles in about 60 hours of flying time, spaced over a week. When the China Clipper splashed down in Manila Bay, it delivered more than just letters; it delivered proof that the world had changed. The daunting Pacific had been tamed by American engineering.

Today, we take momentary global connection for granted. We complain about Wi-Fi speeds on flights that cross oceans in mere hours. But it was this specific moment on a November morning that shrunk the globe and launched the Golden Age of Aviation.

The ocean remained vast, but American wings had finally grown large enough to span it.

On this date in history November 22, 1935, a 26-ton flying boat defied the Pacific Ocean. The China Clipper hauled 110,000 letters from California to Manila, island-hopping 8,000 miles. It turned a dangerous month-long voyage into a 6-day sprint. American aviation shrank the globe forever.

TORAH BOMB QUESTIONS

Sometimes what counts is what is not said, not what is said.....

As Yaakov Aveenu makes his way from his home to Lavan's house in Charan, he stops at the holy Mount Moriah. This is where Adam brought the first korbon, it is where Kayin and Hevel brought their karbonos. This is where Akaydas Yitzchak took place.

Yaakov is a bit stunned that it is indeed the holy spot as he has reached it way before he expected to. He sleeps and dreams. In his dream appears a prophecy of reassurance. Hashem yisbarach will bless him and will watch over him. He will leave the holy land in peace and return in peace. Hashem has got his back.

Having run from his twin brother, he is conflicted. Did he do right by G-d? Was it ok to fool his father to receive the blessing? The mere fact that Hashem communicates with him is pure comfort. But what must bother him is what is NOT said. Nowhere in his dream is the Bracha he usurped mentioned. Nowhere does Hashem bless Yaakov with the dew, the fats of the land or the wealth of the Esauv bracha!

One may point to all the wealth Yaakov and family own after leaving the house of Lavan. Surely, he was blessed!! But was that the Esauv Bracha? What else could it be?

You see there are other factors. Yaakov made a vow to G-d. Give me what I need please, I will tithe to you 10 or 20%. Or perhaps Yaakov is living a precursor to Egypt and its Golus. Maybe Yaakov is enslaved in a foreign land. Maybe he leaves Brchush Gadol? As foretold in the Brit bayn Habisorim?? All these issues cloud the possibilities. In fact, is the Esauv Bracha coming true in the life of Yaakov?

Stay tuned to next week's Parsha!

Best homemade kishka

And so easy to make. I doubled the recipe

Mix together:

- 1/2 cup oil
- 1/4 cup water
- 1 TBSP paprika
- 1 TSP salt
- 1 TSP garlic powder
- 1/4 TSP black pepper
- (Optional ©) 1 TBSP sugar

The add:

- One cup flour

Instructions :

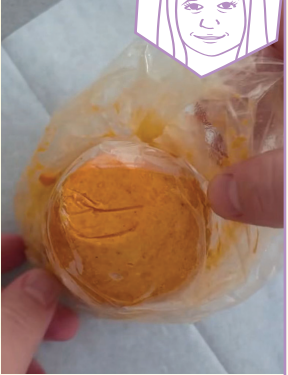

Mix well and knead for a couple minutes.

You will see consistency change when mixed properly.

Shaping tip: Line a tall round cup with a plastic bag, press the dough inside, and freeze for about 2 hours (or until you're ready to cook).

Once it's stiff enough, place the kishka into the cholent or directly into boiling water.

Cook at least 2 hours.
