JONAH'S JEWISH JOKES

By: Jonah Lenefsky

Two guys have been learning together every morning for years. One day, one of them says, "Moishy... I never told you this - I'm not Jewish."

Moishy is shocked. "What do you mean? You daven three times a day, keep kosher, know every halacha - you even buy the $18 donuts on Chanukah!" The friend shrugs. "I just like doing all that. But I'm not Jewish." Moishy says, "But you keep Shabbos - and a non-Jew isn't allowed to keep Shabbos!" The friend smiles: "That's why I always carry a key in my pocket." Moishy throws up his hands - "There's an eruv!" The friend shrugs: "Yeah but I don't hold of it."

Hilchos Birchas Hamazon:

One should not remove the tablecloth or the bread until after Borching, so that there is bread on the table during Birchas Hamazon.

This is to show the abundance of food from HaShem, and because the Bracha needs something to take effect on.

CRAZY ANIMAL CORNER

Serval Cat

1. Super Long Legs

Servals have the longest legs (compared to body size) of any cat in Africa. Their long legs help them see over tall grass and jump really high.

2. Amazing Jumpers

A serval can jump up to 10 feet in the air to catch birds and insects — that's as high as a basketball hoop!

3. Huge Ears for Hearing

Their ears are big and round like radars. They can hear tiny animals moving underground and then pounce at the perfect moment.

Parashas Shemos. Perek 2. Pasuk 23.

"And the king of Mitzrayim died". Rashi explains that the pasuk teaches us that Pharaoh got tzaraas. How does Rashi know that he got tzaraas? Why can't it simply mean that he died as the pasuk says?

The answer is that there is a pasuk in Koheles (8:8) that "there is no authority on the day of death". This means that even a king cannot tell the angel of death to leave him alone on the day of death because he has no authority. For example, when Shlomo and Dovid died it says "Shlomo died" and "Dovid died" and not king Shlomo or king Dovid. Therefore, since this pasuk says that the "KING" of Mitzrayim died it cannot mean that he actually died because he would not be referred to as king if he died since he has no power as king on the day of his death. Therefore, he must have gotten tzaraas which is considered as if he is dead. (Vilna Gaon)

THIS WEEK IN JEWISH HISTORY

Wall Street pioneer Mickie Siebert rings closing bell of New York Stock exchange - January 5, 1998

Known as the "First Woman of Finance," Muriel "Mickie" Siebert rang the closing bell of the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE) on January 5, 1998 to commemorate her 30 years as a member. She was the first woman to own her own seat and the first to own her own brokerage, Muriel Siebert & Co.

A dentist's daughter from Cleveland, OH, Siebert never graduated from college. Still, by lying about her education, she was able to get a low-level job at a prominent Wall Street firm where she eventually became partner before striking out on her own. In 1967, after being rejected by nine of the first ten men she asked to sponsor her application, Siebert became the first woman to purchase a seat on the NYSE. A decade later, New York Governor Hugh Carey appointed Siebert the first woman New York State Superintendent of Banking, a post she held for five years. After an unsuccessful 1982 bid for a United States Senate seat, Siebert returned to Wall Street, where she became an outspoken critic of business and financial practices.

Throughout her career, Siebert worked on behalf of women in business and politics, donating millions of dollars from her brokerage and securities underwriting business to help other women break into the world of business and high finance. She is a founding member and former president of the Women's Forum, an international women's leadership network, and a member of the Committee of 200, a group of over 445 leading American businesswomen. Siebert was inducted into the National Women's Hall of Fame in 1994.

Make sure to shovel out nearby fire hydrants after snowfall. Clear at least a 3-foot radius around the hydrant and a path to the street—this ensures firefighters can quickly locate and access it in an emergency, potentially saving minutes that could prevent a small fire from becoming catastrophic.

STORY OF THE WEEK By: Zechariah Lipitz

In 1812, Napoleon invaded Russia, and the route of the invasion led through White Russia. Rabbi Shneur Zalman, leader of the Chasidic movement in White Russia, who had twice been accused of high treason, turned out to be a most loyal patriot. Although the French conqueror was hailed in some religious Jewish quarters as the harbinger of a new era of political and economic freedom, Rabbi Shneur Zalman saw in Napoleon a threat to basic religious principles and spiritual values. The Rebbe had nothing but contempt for the man whose arrogance and lust for power knew no bounds, and who represented to the Chabad leader the antithesis of humility and holiness. The Rebbe urged his numerous followers to help the Russian war effort against the invaders in every possible way. With the aid of his followers behind the enemy lines, some of whom were employed by the French Military Command, Rabbi Shneur Zalman was also able to render valuable intelligence service to the Russian generals at the front.
When the French armies approached Liadi, the Russian generals advised Rabbi Shneur Zalman to flee. In August (1812) the Rebbe hastily left Liadi, leaving everything behind, and fled with his family towards Smolensk. For some five months Rabbi Shneur Zalman and his family suffered the hardships and perils of the road and of an unusually inclement winter, until they reached a village in the district of Kursk. Here the Rebbe succumbed to a severe illness in the final stages of the harrowing journey and passed away at the age of 68. Traditions and records preserved in the family of Rabbi Shneur Zalman provide interesting details in connection with the Rebbe's last and fateful journey. From an account by Rabbi Nachum, grandson of the Rebbe, relating his personal experiences, we learn the following details:
The Rebbe fled from Liadi on the advice of the generals commanding the Russian armies in that area. Sixty wagons were put at his disposal, but they were not enough, and many had to walk on foot. A number of armed troops were assigned to accompany and protect the caravan. In view of the rapid advance of the French army, the generals suggested that the best route for the flight of the Rebbe would be through the town of Bayev. But the Rebbe decided to head for Krasna, urging the caravan to make the utmost haste, in order to cross the river Dnieper at the earliest possible time.
After covering a distance of about two miles, the Rebbe suddenly requested that the accompanying troops to let him go back to Liozna. Arriving at his deserted house, he ordered his men to search the house carefully to make sure that nothing whatever, however trivial, had been overlooked. The only things found were a pair of worn-out slippers, a rolling pin and a sieve, which had been left in the attic. He ordered these to be taken along, and to set the house on fire before the enemy arrived, first removing the sacred Torah scrolls from the adjacent synagogue. Then he blessed those of the townspeople who remained in the town and speedily departed again.
No sooner had he left the town on the road leading to the Dnieper than the "front-runner" of Napoleon's army reached the town from the opposite end. Presently, Napoleon himself with his entourage entered the town on their galloping steeds. Napoleon inquired after the house of the Rebbe, but when he reached it, he found it ablaze, the fire burning beyond control. Napoleon wished to have something which belonged to the Rebbe and offered a rich reward to anyone who could bring him anything. But nothing was there. [It seems that Napoleon practiced some sort of sorcery for which such an object was required.]
During all his long and arduous journey Rabbi Shneur Zalman kept in touch with the situation of Russian Jewry caught in the gigantic Franco-Russian war. The retreating Russian armies, using the scorched earth policy in order to deprive the enemy of vitally needed supplies, exacted a tremendous sacrifice from its own people. At the same time the invading armies plundered everything they could lay their hands on. Starvation and ruination were the order of the day, and the Rebbe's heart went out to his suffering brethren, who were the most hard-hit victims of the invasion.
The Rebbe had foreseen Napoleon's invasion of Moscow as well as his defeat there. He also predicted that Napoleon's final defeat would be at the hands of his own compatriots. At the same time, he knew that the retreating French armies, starving and desperate, would plunder the Jewish communities which lay in their path. Arriving in Piena, the Rebbe embarked upon a relief campaign to aid the Jewish victims of the war, including resettlement plans, fund raising, and relief distribution. For ten days after his arrival in Piena the Rebbe worked feverishly on his plans and projects to alleviate the plight of his brethren. Then, he fell ill, his condition worsening day by day.
At the conclusion of Shabbat, he composed a letter full of mystical allusions, and a few minutes later he returned his soul to his Maker.
