Concerns over hygiene and public health plagued the daily lives of residents in the Old Yishuv throughout the 19th century. Grinding poverty, malnutrition, squalid living conditions, and a dearth of adequate health care facilities in Ottoman Palestine facilitated the spread of disease. In order to alleviate the deplorable health situation, and to provide a viable alternative to the local missionary-run hospitals, three Jewish hospitals were established in the Old City in the later decades of the century. The first was the Meir Rothschild Hospital, named for and funded by Baron James Mayer de Rothschild of France, followed by Misgav Ladach and Bikur Cholim. At the turn of the 20th century, members of the Kollel Ho'd (Holland and Deutschland) community embarked on an ambitious initiative to build a new Jewish hospital, the first one to be constructed outside the Old City. A plot of land was purchased on the outskirts of the small Shaare Zedek neighborhood, down Rechov Yaffo. The hospital would eventually assume the name of the neighborhood, though for decades it would be referred to as "Wallach's Hospital" after its legendary founder. Born into a prestigious Neo-Orthodox family in a small town near Cologne in 1866, a young Moshe Wallach attended medical school in Berlin and Wurzburg. When he was 24, he was dispatched to Jerusalem by the Frankfurt community and the Vaad Hapekידim Vhamakalim in Amsterdam, which oversaw funding for the Old Yishuv, to assist with medical care. Settling in the Old City, he had the distinction of being the first known physician to perform a tracheotomy within its walls. Following several years of making house visits and operating a private clinic — he was also a mohel — he returned to Europe to fundraise in Germany and the Netherlands for building Shaare Zedek. Upon completion, Shaare Zedek was the most beautiful building in Jerusalem, and its spacious wards and grounds made it the largest state-of-the-art facility in the city. The ceremonial opening took place on January 27, 1902, the birthday of Germany's Kaiser Wilhelm II. Dr. Wallach was appointed the general director and chief physician of the hospital. He wanted to have the most modern medical facility in the country, with high hygienic standards, the first quarantine ward for infectious diseases, vaccinations, and even a dairy on hospital grounds to provide fresh milk for the patients — no small luxury in Jerusalem of that era. Providing medical care at a high standard was just one facet of Dr. Wallach's vision. He was also a prominent activist within the Eidah Hachareidis and a close confidant of Rav Yosef Chaim Sonnenfeld. Dr. Wallach's religious vision for the hospital included an active shul and fully kosher kitchen; the hospital administration was to adhere to halachah, and work on Shabbos was limited to life-saving activities or performed by non-Jews. Dr. Wallach's vision of a top medical facility adhering strictly to halachah is still upheld in today's Shaare Zedek. Dr. Wallach carried a large key ring and personally opened and locked the doors to the hospital's wards every morning and evening. Having never married, he devoted his life to Shaare Zedek and lived within its walls even following his retirement in 1947 at the age of 80. Dr. Moshe Wallach's yahrzeit is 7 Nissan.

Make sure to shovel out nearby fire hydrants after snowfall. Clear at least a 3-foot radius around the hydrant and a path to the street—this ensures firefighters can quickly locate and access it in an emergency, potentially saving minutes that could prevent a small fire from becoming catastrophic.

Parshas Bo. Perek 13. Pasuk 3.

This pasuk discusses the laws of the firstborn male, who is considered a "bechor". The question is, why is it only the firstborn male of a mother that's considered a bechor, and not the firstborn of the father?

To answer this question, we have to answer a different question. Who actually killed the firstborns in Mitzrayim - was it Hashem or the "mashchit" (destroyer)? The answer is that Hashem killed the firstborn males from the father, while the mashchit killed the firstborn males from the mother.

Why the distinction? Only Hashem knows who the firstborn of a father is, but everyone can know who the firstborn of a mother is. So, the Jewish firstborns from the father weren't in danger, but the firstborns of the mother were at risk from the mashchit, and that's where the miracle happened - when they put blood on the doorpost and stayed indoors. (Reb Akiva Eiger)

STORY OF THE WEEK By: Zechariah Lipitz

The early 1920s were years of turmoil for Russia in general, and for the Ch movement in particular. As the country emerged from civil war and widespread famine, the communist government consolidated its stifling grasp and stepped up its campaign to eliminate Jewish religious life. It was precisely at this time that Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneersohn of Lubavitch assumed the leadership of the movement following the passing of his father. Whatever the personal cost, he was determined to keep Judaism alive.

The first meeting between Rabbi Menachem Mendel ("the Rebbe") and Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak occurred in Rostov in 1922.2 During his second visit, a few months later, R. Yosef Yitzchak delivered a Chassidic discourse elaborating on the divine desire for a dwelling in the "lowest realms" (i.e., the material world), achieved through man's toil and suprarational commitment to serve his Creator, to the point of self-sacrifice. The transcendent soul, he explained, endures and even prospers in the face of adversity. It was this very discourse that R. Yosef Yitzchak published on the eve of his passing, twenty-seven years later, and which R. Menachem Mendel expounded on each subsequent year on the anniversary of R. Yosef Yitzchak's passing for the following four decades.

Later that year, R. Menachem Mendel journeyed to Kislovodsk, a spa city in the North Caucasus where R. Yosef Yitzchak was then staying with his family. R. Eliyahu Chaim Althoiz, a close confidant of Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak, later recalled the circumstances: "In the summer of 1923 the Rebbe privately revealed to me the hidden intention of his heart... to marry his precious and beloved daughter to the man about whom I now speak... and he (R. Yosef Yitzchak) choose me then to create the opportunity to bring him (R. Menachem Mendel) from Yekaterinoslav to Kislovodsk."

When R. Yosef Yitzchak returned to Rostov, he was accompanied by his son-in-law, Rabbi Shmaryahu Gourarie, and by R. Menachem Mendel. Five days later he wrote to the prospective bride, his daughter Chaya Mushka: "This week I thoroughly studied 'the ways of Mendel' (hilchot Mendel)... On Sunday the three of us spent the entire day together, it was very pleasant... He is left with a good and pleasant impression from the Caucasus, and would like to go for a stroll on the mountain again... He is very companionable and affable, which adds a great deal."

The congenial companionship described in this letter bellies the tremendous pressure that R. Yosef Yitzchak was under at the time. In a letter penned just ten days later he described the desperate situation: "Synagogues are being forcefully requisitioned... Jewish schools are being closed down, and if anywhere students are to be found, they are studying in secluded secrecy, fearing for their lives due to hidden spies..." R. Yosef Yitzchak stood at the center of an underground network, working tirelessly and at great personal risk to keep the basic infrastructure of Jewish life intact. Throughout this period, he corresponded with supporters in America and Europe and shuttled back and forth between Rostov and Moscow to deliberate with fellow rabbis and sympathetic lawyers. In the spring of 1924 he was threatened with arrest and forced to move from Rostov to Leningrad.

During this period, R. Menachem Mendel was based in Yekaterinoslav, where he pursued Torah studies and also deepened his knowledge of the sciences. The fruits of his labors are acknowledged in the certificate of rabbinic ordination (smicha) issued in 1924 by his uncle, Rabbi Shmuel Schneersohn of Nikolayev, describing him to be "filled with [knowledge of] Talmud and legal decisions, earlier and later authorities, like one of the greats."

In Leningrad, where he frequently visited his prospective father-in-law and bride, R. Menachem Mendel became acquainted with Rabbi Yosef Rosen, the famed Rogatchover Gaon, whose unique approach to Torah scholarship would prove influential in the development of R. Menachem Mendel's own path. The earliest surviving manuscript in the Rebbe's hand is a letter addressed in reply to the Rogatchover, respectfully taking issue with his position on a point of Talmudic law. The letter dates from early in 1925 and is filled with tight arguments buttressed by a diverse range of Talmudic citations, reminiscent of the Rogatchover's own style.

This piece of correspondence is also notable for another reason. Significantly, the Rebbe used the name and address of an acquaintance, Mordechai Gourarie, rather than his own. Years later, the Rebbe was asked the reason for this and explained that given R. Yosef Yitzchak's prominent position at the head of the Jewish underground, undue use of their shared surname was deemed unwise. The fear of government scrutiny was certainly not unfounded. Things came to a head in the summer of 1927; R. Yosef Yitzchak was arrested, sentenced to death, exiled, and then expelled from the Soviet Union.15 R. Menachem Mendel had been in Leningrad at the time of the arrest. Five days after R. Yosef Yitzchak left the country, his future son-in-law crossed the soviet border and joined him in Riga.
