STORY OF THE WEEK By: Zechariah Lipitz

Rabbi Yehuda Lowe of Prague, known as the Maharal, was born in 1512 and was the descendant of famous scholars. He could trace his lineage back to King David. Recognized as a genius from early childhood, he was engaged at the age of 10 to an equally remarkable woman named Pearl. A scholar in her own right, she was a loyal partner of her husband and epitomized the Jewish ideal of a "woman of valor."

It was customary in those times for matches to be arranged while the couple was still very young, the marriage itself taking place sometimes only years later. And so, the Maharal, at the age of ten, was engaged to Pearl, the daughter of the wealthy and influential Shmuel Reich. She was only six at the time. According to the marriage agreement, the Maharal continued his studies, illuminating one of the outstanding yeshivot of his day. After the agreed upon years of study expired, he requested permission to continue, since his fiancée was still only fourteen. Pearl was a girl of exceptional intellectual capacity. At the age of six she was sufficiently mature enough to appreciate the great genius of the Maharal, and she, desirous of being a worthy partner, embarked on an intensive program of study. She learned secretly all the years of their engagement, until, when he returned, the Maharal was delighted and amazed to discover the extent of her accomplishment. He returned with her permission to his yeshiva studies, but before leaving, he prepared a syllabus for her to follow in his absence.

During the period of the Maharal's absence, financial disaster struck Shmuel Reich, leaving him impoverished. The Maharal received a letter from his future father-in-law explaining the situation and releasing him from his promise to marry Pearl. In his immediate reply, the Maharal, while expressing his sympathy, reiterated his intention to marry Pearl regardless of financial considerations, unless she was unwilling to wait for him. More time passed, until the year 1543 arrived, bringing with it a war in Bohemia. The Maharal returned home to his fiancée who was now supporting herself and her parents by running a food store. Pearl, who had been studying Torah during the twenty-two years of their separation, had become an extraordinarily accomplished scholar. She was now twenty-eight years old, and the Maharal thirty-two. Finally, they began their married life. To enable her husband to pursue his studies, Pearl continued to work in her store, learning Torah after her work was done.

The Bohemian war continued unabated until it reached Prague. One day, an armed soldier entered Pearl's store and demanded that she furnish him with a large amount of food which he loaded into his carriage. However, when she asked for payment, he refused, saying he had no money.

Pearl, whose very livelihood was at stake, explained to him that this store was the only source of support for her family, and he was moved by her words.

He gave her a beautiful embroidered garment as a pledge, promising to return in a few days to redeem it. If unable to come, he said, the garment would be hers to keep. Days passed and the soldier failed to appear. Knowing that in dire times people sometimes hid jewels in their garments, Pearl opened the lining of the soldier's coat and discovered a large number of precious stones. The couple waited longer for the soldier's return, but when he failed to come, the garment and gems were theirs.

No longer in a precarious financial state, Pearl was now freed from the burden of supporting her family. Pearl used to say that she had since the age of eight studied Torah each day for no less than five hours. Now, she could continue, unhampered, studying with her illustrious husband topics ranging from Talmud to ethics and metaphysics.

It was Pearl who dealt with the Maharal's voluminous Jewish legal correspondence, reading the letters and sending his replies to the many communities which turned to her husband for his decisions. It was also she who arranged and edited her husband's huge opus of Torah literature. It is said that in at least eight places she discovered errors in the Maharal's writings.

Pearl was the mother of a son and three daughters. Her husband applied to her the quotation: "Many daughters have done well, but you surpass them all."

MEGA VORT By: Yoel Megadesh

Parshas Mishpatim. Perek 21. Verse 37.

This pasuk speaks about how if someone steals and sells or slaughters an ox, he has to pay 5 times the worth of the ox. If it was a sheep he has to pay 4 times it's worth. The question is, why pay 4 or 5 times the worth of the animal? It seems like a random number. The answer is that when some steals and sells or slaughters an animal, he has really thought through his actions, and it cannot be considered a spur of the moment sin. He therefore has to pay for each action of the sin. When he stole the animal he has to pay the amount he stole and the amount he tried to make the person lose (this is known as keifel). This is already twice the worth of the animal. Then he had to 1) tie up the ox, 2) throw it to the floor and finally 3) slaughter the ox. These 3 steps are added to the keifel is 5 times the amount of the ox. A sheep, however, is much easier to tie up and throw down so that is considered one action and therefore he has to pay only 4 times the worth of a sheep. If he sells an ox he has to 1) find a buyer, 2) bargain the price and finally 3) exchange the money. These 3 steps added to the keifel is 5 times the worth of the ox. A sheep, however, is easier to find a buyer so only the final 2 steps are added to the keifel which is 4 times the worth of the sheep. (Akedas Yitzchok)
