

By Rabbi Dr. Shaul Schwalb

There is a well known argument regarding how many mitzvot the construction of the Mishkan compose. Rambam feels that only one Mitzva includes the entire Mishkan construction and all of its utensils etc. According to the Ramban, each utensil construction is a mitza independently. Yet all agree that there is one negative commandment, namely that the badim, the poles may never ever be taken out of the rings attached to the Aron. What is hard to understand is according to the Ramban who does not detail the action to many mitzvot but rather only one mitzva, how can he detail an additional negative mitzva; the pole removal? Worse, we know that during the second Mikdash we did not have an Aron and even so, we have a mitzva that is eternal regarding the detail of the poles on that very same Aron that is not even essential to the Mikdash? Furthermore, we see another fascinating law regarding the holy Aron. The cover, the Kapores cannot be constructed or placed to close the Aron without first placing the Luchos in the Aron first. Why? So these combinations of laws about the Aron are to teach us the essence of the Aron. Much like a car, that needs an engine, a body and wheels to be called a car, the Aron needs all its parts, and especially its wheels, the poles that carry the Aron that give it mobility. The lesson is clear, Torah must be on the move with the people, not in a museum or in the corner to be stared at in its holiness! The Badim, the poles cannot be removed causing it to become stagnant, as our life source is that Torah. In addition we need to understand that that set of Luchos, the Torah must be seen as the point not its luxurious and beautiful gold box enclosing it. The cover is not the point neither are the Keruvim adorning it, but rather without the Luchos or Torah there is no Aron to be closed!

Yitzhak Kaduri (Hebrew: יצחק קדורי, Arabic: إسماعيل الخضوري), also spelled Kadouri, Kadorie, Kedorie (c. 1898 – January 28, 2006), was a Haredi rabbi and kabbalist. He taught and practiced the kavanot of the Rashash. His amulets were distributed to voters before the Israeli election in May 1996, in exchange for their votes for Benjamin Netanyahu and the Shas party. During his lifetime he published no religious articles or books. At the time of his death, estimates of his age ranged from 103 to 108, and his birth year is still disputed. His funeral, held in Jerusalem, drew over 200,000 followers. Kaduri was born in Baghdad, which was then part of the Ottoman Empire. His father, Rabbi Kadhuri Diba ben Aziza, was a spice trader. Kaduri excelled in his studies and began learning Kabbalah while still in his teens.[3] He was a child student of Rabbi Yosef Hayyim and studied at the Zilka Yeshivah in Baghdad. He moved to the British Mandate of Palestine in 1923 and there changed his name from Diba to Kaduri to honor his father whom he had left in Baghdad. Kaduri lived a life of poverty and simplicity. He ate little, spoke little, and prayed each month at the gravesites of tzaddikim in Israel. His first wife, Rabbanit Sara, died in 1989. He remarried in 1993 to Rabbanit Dorit, a baalat teshuva just over half his age. In January 2006, Rabbi Kaduri was hospitalized with pneumonia in the Bikur Holim Hospital in Jerusalem. He died at around 10 p.m. January 28, 2006 (29 Tevet 5766). He was alert and lucid until his last day. More than 200,000 people took part in his funeral procession on January 29, which started from the Nachalat Yitzchak Yeshivah and wound its way through the streets of Jerusalem to the Givat Shaul cemetery (also known as Har HaMenuchoth) near the entrance to the city of Jerusalem.

Weekly Q&A with Dr. Shari Hirsch,
Pediatrician and Lactation Specialist at Lev Pediatric Care

"My child has a fever. When should I treat it, and when can I let it ride?"

Few things make a parent's heart race like seeing a high number on a thermometer, especially in the middle of the night. Fevers are one of the most common reasons parents call or rush in, and understandably so. The reassuring truth is that most fevers are a sign that your child's body is doing exactly what it's supposed to do.

A fever is not an illness. It's the body's response to infection, most often viral. By raising the body temperature, the immune system helps fight germs more effectively. In children, a fever is generally defined as 100.4°F or higher. Kids with fevers may look flushed, tired, clingy, or uncomfortable, but the number alone doesn't tell the whole story.

You don't need to treat every fever. The more important question is how your child is acting. Treat the fever if your child is clearly uncomfortable, not drinking well, not sleeping because they feel unwell, or very fussy or achy. Acetaminophen or ibuprofen (for children over 6 months) can help your child feel better, and comfort is the goal. It's okay to watch and wait if your child is drinking fluids, alert, interacting, and resting comfortably, even if the temperature is higher. Some children will still play or talk with a fever, and that's reassuring.

Age matters when it comes to fevers. Any fever in a baby under 2 months requires immediate medical evaluation. For babies 2 to 6 months old, fevers should be discussed with your pediatrician, especially if feeding or behavior seems off.

Reach out if a fever lasts more than 3 days, if your child has trouble breathing, signs of dehydration, persistent vomiting, a concerning rash, or if a fever improves and then returns. Always check in sooner if something just doesn't feel right.

Fevers can be stressful, but most are part of the healing process. Focus less on the number and more on your child. Treat discomfort, encourage fluids, and trust your instincts. Your pediatrician is here to help you decide when to treat and when it's okay to let it ride.

1. It's black ALL over
2. It has a super-rare condition
3. It comes from Indonesia

This chicken isn't just black feathers — its beak, skin, legs, tongue, and even bones are black too!

The Ayam Cemani has something called fibromelanosis, which makes its body produce way more dark pigment than normal animals.

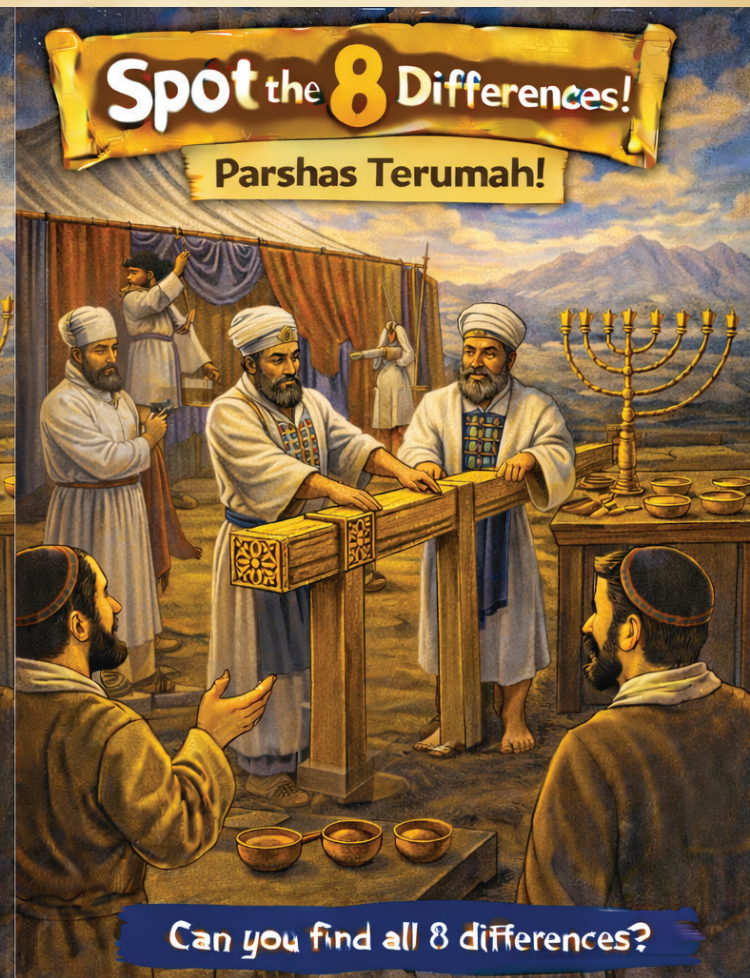

This mysterious chicken comes from Indonesia and is considered very rare and special around the world.
