2 sticks margarine (room temperature or in microwave for 30 seconds)
Add 2 cups sugar, Mix well. Add 2 eggs, 1/4 cup orange juice, 2 tsp vanilla (extract or vanilla sugar) Mix well. Now you can change the beater to the little dough hook if you have one. Add 4 cups flour, 1-1/3 tbsp baking powder, Pinch salt.

Mix until well incorporated. If it's still very smoochy and too soft, then add a little extra flour. You can also refrigerate dough covered for an hour, so the dough thickens a little. The margarine causes the dough to be soft.

Do your thing. Spray parchment paper with pan. Roll out dough. Not too thin.

Use something round to make circles. Top of a glass or plastic cup. I use the screwing part of a quart size "ball jar". Don't put in more than a generous teaspoon of filling. Poppy, prune butter, lotus cream, liquid chocolate. Marshmallows. Anything that will make you happy!!! Make a triangle by pinching the top closed and then pinch two more corners to form triangle. Bake at 350 for 12 minutes. Not more. Allow to cool and harden somewhat before eating. Before baking, refrigerate formed hamentaschen for 30 minutes or more.
Don't put them too close together on the baking sheet. They do rise from the baking powder. You can also refrigerate the extra dough, it's very forgiving and easy to work with.

If you ever see a product promising to make your child “immune” to illness, the best question to ask is simple: where’s the evidence?

1. They always look unimpressed. Tibetan foxes are famous for their square-shaped faces and serious expressions—it looks like they're judging everything around them!
2. They have a hunting buddy They often follow brown bears while hunting. When the bear digs up prey like pikas, the fox sneaks in to grab one—teamwork without a handshake!
3. They live way up high. Tibetan foxes live on the Tibetan Plateau, one of the highest places on Earth, over 14,000 feet above sea level, where the air is thin and winters are brutal.

STORY OF THE WEEK By: Zechariah Lipitz

The bitter cold chilled the officer's bones and fear made his heart tremble. Ivan was not a coward, but the rumors of the sadistic Bolsheviks who were nearing the city of Rostov frightened him terribly. He paced the streets, waiting anxiously for the light of day. He was oblivious to the two men following at his heels, not making a sound. Suddenly he felt powerful hands grabbing him. He screamed a loud and bitter scream, but the two held him. In the morning the body of the officer was found with the warning: "Beware! The Bolsheviks are coming!" The Jews were the most shaken by news of the Bolsheviks' approach, as the study of Torah and observance of its precepts was a serious crime to the Bolsheviks. There was only one part of the city where life went on as usual, where fear of the Bolsheviks was not felt: in the Yeshiva Tomchei Temimim. The yeshiva students continued their studies without disruption. They drew their strength from their Rebbe, Rabbi Sholom Dovber of Lubavitch - the fifth Rebbe of the Chabad dynasty. The Rebbe encouraged them to study and pray as usual, and the yeshiva bustled with life. It was Zundel the Beggar who brought the news: "The Bolsheviks are on their way into the city!" Soon Rostov became a city of flames, and the Bolsheviks beat and killed anyone they chanced upon. Thus passed several weeks. The holiday of Purim was approaching. The Rebbe isolated himself and didn't speak to anyone. The students could not make peace with the Rebbe's isolation. They remembered the great joy of Purim, when Jews celebrate the victory over Haman who tried to "destroy, kill and annihilate." And then it was Purim. Not a soul smiled. Finally, two yeshiva students who could no longer bear the thought of Purim passing in such a manner, summoned up their courage and entered the Rebbe's room. After a few silent moments they heard the Rebbe's voice: "The Bolsheviks are in the city. I cannot exist together with them. But for the sake of Purim, we'll forget about the situation. Go buy plenty of vodka and let there be light for the Jews!" The good news spread through the city and the yeshiva students took their places for the Purim gathering. The Rebbe spoke and all listened. When the Rebbe concluded, an older Chasid began singing a soulful Chasidic niggun (melody). Everyone joined in, singing from the depths of their hearts. Suddenly the door burst open. At the entrance stood a Chasid. "The Bolsheviks are coming," the Chasid cried out in fear. The singing stopped at once; everyone was gripped with terror. The Rebbe, however, disregarded the news, and began singing a niggun very softly. The melody touched and calmed the frightened crowd. Having concluded the melody, the Rebbe began saying a Chasidic discourse. The room was silent; the only audible sound was the Rebbe's voice. Suddenly the silence was broken by loud knocking. The Rebbe continued speaking as though nothing was happening. After a few moments one of the members of the Rebbe's family said: "Rebbe, the Bolsheviks are demanding that we let them in. If they see us gathered here it will be our end... G-d forbid." The Rebbe interrupted the discourse and said, "Open the door for them." In the doorway stood two tall and fearsome looking Bolsheviks, their eyes darting all about, hungry for prey. "What is this gathering? What is going on?" Trembling, one of the Chasidim called out, "This is the Rebbe Sholom Dovber of Lubavitch. He is teaching Torah to his Chasidim. The Rebbe is busy with his talk and he cannot be bothered." He could hardly believe the words that came from his mouth. The two soldiers were astounded at the Chasid's nerve, and they turned on their heels and departed. "An open miracle!" the Chasidim exclaimed to one another. They felt protected and sang with greater fervor. Thus passed two hours. So immersed were they in their joy, that they did not hear the Bolsheviks knocking again... "Rebbe, what shall we do?" several frightened Chasidim cried out. The Rebbe freed himself from his thoughts and said, "Open for them! I don't fear them." The Chasidim understood that another great miracle was about to occur. The Bolsheviks burst through the door, their weapons in hand. The Rebbe ignored their threatening presence and said, "We will begin saying some words of Torah." The Rebbe raised his voice and began, "Amalek is first among the nations but his end will be destruction." The Bolsheviks' faces softened. Their swords returned to their sheaths, and they watched with growing perplexity as the Chasidim listened to the Rebbe. They looked at one another and then, without a word, turned and left. The Chasidim thanked G-d for miraculously saving them and for giving them their Rebbe in whose presence evil had no power. Everyone was deeply moved, feeling in their hearts without knowing why that this would be their last gathering with the Rebbe. Painful tears flowed from their eyes, tears of parting. A week after Purim the Rebbe became very weak, and on the second of Nissan his soul departed in holiness and purity.

Hilchos Purim
The four Mitzvos of Purim are Mishloach Manos, Matanos La'evyonim, Megila, and the Purim meal. Mishloach Manos which is a gift to a friend, a man should only send to a man, and a woman should only send to another woman. However, Matanos La'evyonim which means giving money to the poor, a woman can send to a man - and vice versa.
Short Halacha from Kitzur Shulchan Aruch

MEGA VORT By: Yoel Megadesh

Purim
Haman offered Achashverosh 10,000 kikar kesef for permission to kill all the Jews. The question is; Achashverosh was the king and was surely wealthy, so why would Haman offer this money and why was it plausible that Achashverosh would want this money? Secondly, in the end Achashverosh told Haman that he could keep the money. If the money is something he would have wanted, why did he tell Haman to keep it? The answer is that Chazal say that someone who loves money will not be satisfied with money and always wants more money. As they say, "someone who has 100$ wants 200$". So Haman offered Achashverosh money even though Achashverosh was wealthy because he thought he would want more money. But when Achashverosh accepted the offer right away without a counteroffer, Haman started to feel bad and felt that he offered too much. Being that Achashverosh hated the Jews more than Haman, he told Haman to keep the money so he would go through with the plan to kill the Jews and not back out. (Reb Chaim Kanievsky)
