STORY OF THE WEEK By: Zechariah Lipitz

In years gone by, it was not unusual for Chasidim to spend extended periods of time in their rebbe's presence, where they would fine-tune their own character traits and learn a path of spiritual service which would become the basis for their own spiritual endeavors.

Once, Rebbe Michel of Zlotchov, sent one of his Chasidim to another town to learn from a simple, unlearned Jew, the attribute of trust in G-d. The Chasid was a good student, and he remained in that town for many weeks, observing that individual and learning how to perfect his trust in the Creator. Finally, when the time came to leave, the Chasid made his way home, pondering the lessons he had learned. He was walking down the road lost in thought, when he was shaken by the cries and screams of women and children. The Chasid looked up to see two Jewish women, bound in chains, being dragged down the road by two large, muscular gentile guards. He ran after the party and asked the women, "What has happened to you?" The weeping women replied to him, "Our husbands leased the inn which belongs to the master of the village, and they owe him a lot of rent. When they couldn't pay the rent, the master took us and he says he will kill us!"

The Chasid told the guards, "I will go to your master, and I will pay the entire debt." They all went to the house of the master of the village, but instead of finding him, they found the manager of the estate. When the Chasid explained his intention to repay the debt, the manager was very willing to make the deal. "Here are 150 rubles and I will sign a note for the balance," the Chasid said. "You don't know my master," said the manager. "He's not the type to settle for less than the whole amount. He's waited a long time for these Jews to pay up! Either you produce the whole amount, or the deal is off!" The Chasid had no choice but to comply, for the fate of two Jewish families was at stake. He laid all his money on the table but was still short. Then he went and pawned whatever possessions he had to amass the entire sum of money. The manager took the money and released the women.

The Chasid continued on his journey home, giving thanks to the Creator for having given him the privilege of performing the exalted mitzva (commandment) of redeeming captives. Before dark, the Chasid stopped at an inn to rest for the night. He soon fell into conversation with another Jewish traveler, who, by the look of his clothing, was a wealthy merchant. The wealthy Jew asked him many questions. It so happened that the two men came from the same town. They spent the entire evening in pleasant conversation, until the dawn broke and it was time to recite the morning prayer. The Chasid mentioned to his new acquaintance the names of the towns he intended to pass through on his trip home. "You know, I have a relative living in the town of R--, not far from the road you will be taking. For some time I have been looking for a trustworthy messenger with whom I could send him inheritance money. Perhaps you would agree to perform this favor for me?"

The Chasid agreed at once. He wouldn't have to go far out of his way, and he was happy to be able to do yet another favor for a fellow Jew. He took the money and carefully sewed it into the lining of his jacket. The wealthy merchant thanked him warmly and offered to compensate him for his trouble, but the Chasid refused, saying, "It is really no trouble for me to make a short detour, and I'm glad to be able to help you out." But the merchant persisted, saying, "I promise you that your mitzva will stand intact, even though you accept this small gift from me." At last the Chasid agreed to take the money, for indeed, he had not even enough to pay for his night's stay at the inn. The two men shook hands and went their separate ways.

The Chasid finally came to the little town and asked around for the man, but no one recognized the name or the description. He was puzzled, for the merchant had entrusted him with an enormous sum of money. He certainly must have known that his relative lived in that town. Perhaps he was a recluse or lived on the outskirts of the town. The Chasid decided to spend a few days in the town in the hope that he would discover the whereabouts of the lost relative, but all his searching was in vain. It was a very downhearted man who returned to Zlotchov, to the court of Reb Michel. The Chasid went into the room of his Rebbe and related to him all he had learned about his service to the Al-mighty; how he had learned to put his trust entirely in his Creator with a pure and simple belief. He also told the rebbe about his encounter with the two women and how he had ransommed them from their cruel captors. Finally, he told the tzadik about his meeting with the wealthy merchant who had entrusted him to deliver the inheritance to the relative who could not be found.

"Rebbe," said the man, sadly, "In this last mission which was entrusted to me I regret that I have failed, and now, I have a great sum of money which I cannot deliver to its rightful owner." Reb Michel smiled at him and replied, "Let me offer you the explanation of what you experienced. In the merit of the great mitzva of redeeming the two Jewish women, angels were created as your advocates in the Heavenly Court. The man you took for a wealthy merchant was really an angel which was created by your merciful deed, and the money he gave you is for you to make use of with a happy and peaceful heart."

Parsha Shelach. Perek 14. Pasuk 5-6.
These pesukim describe how the leaders reacted when Bnei Yisroel sinned because of the spies that were sent into Eretz Yisroel. Moshe and Aharon fell on their faces to pray while Yehoshua and Calev ripped their clothing. Why did they react differently and why does the pasuk describe Yehoshua and Calev as "those who had spied the land", when we already know they were spies? The answer is the Moshe and Aharon still had hope and prayed to annul the decree, but Yehoshua and Calev knew it would not be annulled, so they ripped their clothing in grief. How did Yehoshua and Calev know more than Moshe and Aharon? Because they had gone into Eretz Yisroel and Eretz Yisroel raises your wisdom and holiness. (Reb Shlomo Kluger)

The laws of theft
It is prohibited to rob or steal, even a minimal amount, whether from a Yid, or a Goy. Even to steal an item with the intent to return it later, such as if you only want to make the person angry, or to "steal," just as a joke.
